Some choose to celebrate February 14th as a moment to express their love. At times we may need encouragement and the cover of a social occasion to proclaim our feelings. We may need a push before we think of others.

On reflection, and despite the commercial exploitation of Valentine's Day, I think a single day when the attention of so many is focused on their expression of love is invaluable.

We may be in a private or public place. We may be in love, have loved, or wish for love. It may be that others have shown us love. Whatever our personal circumstance I have come to view Valentine's Day not just as a prospect for romance, but also as a window of opportunity, a speck of time in which we can choose to declare our feelings and thanks to those who are important to us. . .
